ALL DOPE UPSET—SOX BATTERS FAIL AND PITCHERS ARE GOOD

By Mark Shields

If the White Sox were failing to hit in a game every now and then we might lay the paucity of tallies on the South Side to impervious pitching by the opposition. And there is no doubt but what the Cleveland and Detroit hurlers have performed capably in the last six games out on 35th street.

But the unanimity with which the locals have subsided with their bats, and the length of time such subsidence has lasted, leaves no other conclusion than that the Hose are in the throes of a batting slump, a dismal failure which has tumbled them from a commanding lead to second place.

Take the cases of Joe Jackson, Ed Collins and Happy Felsch. There is a trio of natural .300 hitters, fellows who should clout the ball with great vigor and consistency. But in the past six games their efforts have been practically null and void. Jackson poled a couple yesterday, and Felsch knocked three in one Cleveland game. Ed Collins, in another Indian tussle, hung up two infield safeties. But the remainder of the time, while the clouting three have put in a hit now and then, they have usually been soft, especially when any pals were on base.

This slump, of course, is something that will be discarded in a short time. Collins and the two outfielders are ballplayers of the highest class, fellows who have nerve and courage and who are not dismayed by a slump. They know it is a part of baseball.

The remaining members of the cast have also fallen by the wayside and the burden of the work devolves upon the pitchers. All of which is as
